Architectural applications and the Association's Architectural Guidelines can be found on the Whitney Oaks website at <https://whitneyoaks.org/documents/>. Architectural meetings are held every third Wednesday of the month, via Zoom. For additional architectural application questions please contact Jasmine Brinson via email at jasmine.brinson@managementtrust.com. ■

Whitney Oaks Wildlife Notes

Ed Price

Some birds in Whitney Oaks are seen only during the colder months of the year. One of those winter visitors is the White-crowned Sparrow. These handsome little birds are most readily identified by their black and white-striped crown and gray breast (see photo below). Immature White-crowned sparrows have brown stripes rather than the black and white-striped crown of adults (photo below). Most of the time White-crowned sparrows are seen on the ground or in low vegetation foraging for seeds and insects. When you see one, others are usually close by.

One of the more interesting characteristics of White-crowned sparrows is their unihemispheric slow wave sleep. This is a unique form of sleep in which one half (hemisphere) of the brain can be asleep while the other half of the brain is awake. At the same time, one eye is closed while the other is open. Unihemispheric sleep has been identified in a number of bird species and several marine mammals. In the case of birds on long migration flights, it allows them to sleep and navigate at the same time. In addition, it allows them to remain vigilant for predators while getting some sleep. As for marine mammals such as whales, dolphins and porpoises, unihemispheric sleep allows them to continue active air-breathing while part of the brain is sleeping. They would drown if the entire brain was in sleep mode.

Golden-crowned sparrows are also seen in Whitney Oaks during the winter months but occur in fewer numbers. These sparrows have a distinguishing black band on either side of the head above the eye and a yellow patch on the top of their head (see photo below). They nest in Alaska and Western Canada and migrate south, spending the winter from Vancouver south to Southern California. Their behavior is very similar to White-crowned sparrows and are often seen mixed in flocks with them.

I hired a landscape maintenance person last year to take care of our yard when I had back surgery. He keeps the yard so clean of leaves and debris as well as seeds and insects, I presume, that I am seeing fewer birds than normal. However, I am routinely seeing these sparrows darting in and out of shrubs on my walks along Clubhouse Drive this winter. A good way to invite White-crowned and Golden-crowned sparrows into your yard is to put up a bird feeder and load it with good quality seeds.

I should note that the sparrows typically seen around commercial buildings in Rocklin year-round are English sparrows. This species is not commonly seen in Whitney Oaks.
